Age-related differences in cognition, function, and behaviors of nursing home residents with dementia. Evaluation of factors associated with quality of life (QOL) and function in elderly persons with dementia presents several challenges. This study examines age-related differences among residents of four Missouri nursing homes in nine basic measures of cognition, function, and behaviors to identify areas of potential concern with this population. In this cross-sectional study, 349 residents completed the Brooks adaptation of the Elderly Psychiatric Screening Questionnaire, the Activities of Daily Living (ADL) scale, and the Mini-Mental State Examination. In addition, 6 staff members completed the Staff-Evaluated Quality of Life Scale for Nursing Homes
